★★★★★ 5 out of 5

Agnes Gomillion was a civil rights activist and suffragette who was born in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1895. She was the daughter of former slaves, and she grew up in a poor but close-knit community. Gomillion was a bright and ambitious young woman, and she excelled in school. After graduating from high school, she went on to attend college at Tuskegee Institute.

Gomillion's passion for social justice began at a young age. She was deeply disturbed by the racism and discrimination that she witnessed all around her. In 1913, she joined the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), and she quickly became one of their most active members.

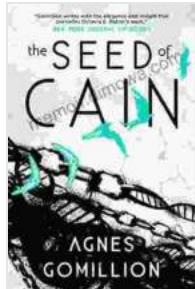

In 1954, Gomillion was arrested for protesting Alabama's segregation laws. She was convicted and sentenced to 30 days in jail. This was just one of many arrests that Gomillion would face over the course of her lifetime. She was never afraid to stand up for what she believed in, even when it meant putting herself in danger.

Gomillion's work for civil rights did not end with the passage of the Voting Rights Act in 1965. She continued to fight for equality and justice for all people, regardless of their race or gender. She was a true pioneer, and her legacy continues to inspire activists today.
