El Capitan

El Capitan is one of the most iconic landmarks in Yosemite, and it's a popular subject for photographers. The sheer size and verticality of the cliff can be daunting, but Adams found ways to capture its grandeur and detail. One of his favorite techniques was to use a telephoto lens to isolate the cliff from its surroundings.

Half Dome

Half Dome is another iconic landmark in Yosemite, and it's one of the most popular hiking destinations in the park. The hike to the top is challenging, but the views from the summit are worth the effort. Adams often photographed Half Dome from Glacier Point, which offers a panoramic view of the cliff. He would often use a long exposure to capture the movement of the clouds and water.

Yosemite Falls

Yosemite Falls is one of the tallest waterfalls in North America, and it's a must-see for any visitor to the park. Adams often photographed Yosemite Falls from the base of the cliff, using a wide-angle lens to capture the full height of the waterfall. He would also often use a slow shutter speed to create a blurred effect, which added to the sense of movement and power of the water.

Tuolumne Meadows

Tuolumne Meadows is a beautiful subalpine meadow located in the eastern part of Yosemite National Park. It's a great place to hike, camp, and photograph wildflowers. Adams often photographed Tuolumne Meadows in the early morning or late evening, when the light was soft and warm. He would often use a wide-angle lens to capture the vastness of the meadow, and he would often include wildflowers in the foreground to add color and interest.

Tips for Photographing Yosemite
